Excerpt: . . . governing the human soul, 1 none satisfies all. There is, as yet, no philosophy large enough to contain or explain all the facts of the psychic universe, and until this is possible no philosophy of education can be complete. It seems that it would be profitable now to suggest briefly the lines upon which the more recent discoveries in biology, physiology, anthropology, psychology, and child-study indicate that a larger and truer future philosophy of education must be developed. The Nature of Man as conditioning Education. Whether man is considered to be by nature primarily good or bad must ultimately condition any theory of education. With the knowledge at hand in the past centuries, it is hardly to be wondered at that no thorough discussion of this question was made. There is the church dogma of the natural total depravity of man; then varying forms of the philosophic concept that a certain faculty, generally the reason, is divine, while another, generally the feeling, is devilish; then the Kantian idea that man is primarily neither good nor bad; and, finally, the worshippers of nature, with Rousseau and Froebel, declare that there is only good in man. Certainly, each of these theories of the human soul must demand a radically different theory of education. Since all of them survive, all probably have some basis of truth. A scientific theory of human nature cannot accept, in its usual meaning, the church doctrine of the fundamentally evil nature of natural...
