Excerpt: . . . MR. TRUNNELL BY some means, needless to record here, I found myself, not so many years ago, on the beach at Melbourne, in Australia. To be on the beach is not an uncommon occurrence for a sailor in any part of the world; but, since the question is suggested, I will say that I was not a very dissipated young fellow of twenty-five, for up to that time I had never even tasted rum in any form, although I had followed the sea for seven years. I had held a mates berth, and as I did not care to ship before the mast on the first vessel bound out, I had remained ashore until a threatening landlord made it necessary for me to become less particular as to occupation. It was a time when mates were plenty and men were few, so I made the rounds of the 9 shipping houses with little hope of getting a chance to show my papers. These, together with an old quadrant, a nautical almanac, a thick pea coat, and a pipe, were all I possessed of this worlds goods, and I carried the quadrant with me in case I should not succeed in signing on. I could spout it, if need be, at some brokers, and thus raise a few dollars. As I made my way along the water front, I noticed a fine clipper ship of nearly two thousand tons lying at a wharf. She was...
