To be compelled to live in the most palatial city surroundings day in and day out, year in and year out, would seem, to the professional gardener, a form of imprisonment for life, for which none of the rewards of success could fully compensate. The rescue of the old homestead has been the dream of many a prosperous city exile, and to many a man the old farm where he was brought up still beckons as a possible haven for his declining years. The man of affairs, who, as a boy, once wandered at will in the country, still dreams, amidst the attractions and distractions of city...
