I had to be accountable for every single one of them. I can remember turning an armory upside down looking for little radiac meters they gave us to see radiation in there that we weren't sure how to use them, but they had been given to us and they had a value; and the checklist and the accountability on that was so strong. I was absolutely there, and I actually processed some of these, on myself and others, a statement of charges if things were lost and they were under your care; and sometimes they were accidental and they would find out what happened and you would be cleared because it got run over accidentally in a training exercise. But there was no doubt in my mind somebody was watching, and I was accountable, and my commander, for every single piece of equipment. And this was back in 1989 when you had the big green printout sheets that would come. With the ability we know now to organize data, it seems amazing to me, because every month a random inventory, a partial inventory of our whole inventory would come out to us and we would have to physically sign off at the end. It behooved you to be organized, to know where this was and to know there was a day of reckoning if it was not there. My question is, especially on a large scale like that - there were thousands of armories across the United States, and if...
