The pain felt by a noble mind, whether it arise from bereavement, and thus like The lightning s flash Reveals what it destroys, or from the petty cares which beset our weary existence in its eternal revolution about the vanity of this world, is never depressing; it is always a brave and elevating sentiment--a kind of suffering pride which alone overcomes the force of adversity. Nature has also expressed her will in the distinction of the sexes, ordaining that tender emotions should afford comfort to the gentler sex, while man finds his support in vigorous efforts of the mind. On this active and passive state of feeling depend the different internal relations of man and woman, whilst the world of thought is the same for both. These few hints may suffice. I have been brief, for my limits will not admit of full discussion. Is it necessary, on the other hand, to waste a word upon the effects of mental emotion on the body? Will any one assert that we can voluntarily produce the same violent shocks as those which impetuous affections often excite, even against our will? History and personal experience furnish us with innumerable examples. When the dumb son of Croesus saw the enemy s sword raised above his father s head, he suddenly cried out, Man, slay not Croesus! Another dumb person recovered his powers of speech, through anger, on seeing the woman whom he thought had bewitched him. Effects such...
