Not illustrated. 1907 Excerpt: .in other words, according to Mill, their existence but not their character. Logically speaking, the same remark holds for all genuine objects of knowledge, that is, for real objects, in both the system of Mill and that of Green. Indeed, their position is at bottom self-contradictory and untenable, as is every other position which is based on the assumption that the object of knowledge is also the datum and starting-point of knowledge. If the object is all there and complete prior to the knowledge process, and we know it to be so, it is idle to talk about a further act of knowing as essential to our knowledge of the object. Such a further act of knowing can contribute absolutely nothing essential to the knowledge already possessed. If, on the other hand, we know nothing whatever about the object to start with, how can we be...
