It has not been written at random, but by request from a source worthy of consideration, at a time when I had the leisure and inclination to comply, and I have selected from a gathering of many years such facts and theories as I thought might be of general interest. The placer gold mines of California are by nature divided into two general classes, the shallow and the deep; the former were first discovered and worked; when the gold crop diminished, prospecting tunnels were driven into low table mountains, revealing extensive and rich deposits; and a new system, called drift mining, followed. Some of these adit levels were more than a mile in extent. In many cases shafts were sunk from the surface several hundred feet in depth, from the bottom of which tunnels were driven in search of gold. These tables cover strata of undoubted sediments varying in texture from boulders weighing tons, to silts, so finely divided that they will not wholly settle in still water for several days. These are the auriferous gravels described by Professor Whitney and others. Since the discovery of gold in them they have been called deep placers, in contradistinction to shallow or surface placers; under table mountains, they have remained intact since the time of their placement. Elsewhere, not so protected, they have been subjected...
